GUARANTORS FOR THE CAPE PLAYHOUSE

THE Cape Playhouse believes firmly that the public is willing to pay for what is good in the Theatre, and with this idea in mind no solicitation of gifts or donations has been made. The theatre's expenses are heavy, however, and since a number of persons have asked what they might do to further the work of the Playhouse, and how they might help to establish eventually an art center of note at Dennis, the Cape Playhouse suggests that these persons become guarantors of the Theatre to the extent of agreeing to purchase two hundred and fifty dollars worth of tickets during the present season. It is requested that the sum be placed at the disposal of the theatre at once, and that tickets be ordered at the box-office, to the extent of this sum, as they are needed. In this way the Cape Playhouse feels assured of the interest and support of its patrons, and is not placed in the position of being subsidized entirely through the generosity or goodwill of the public. It permits the Cape Playhouse to return value for value, and at the same time gives the management some idea of what financial obligations it might still undertake this season in securing for the Cape fine actors, fine plays, and fine productions; what it might do toward establishing a Junior company for the development of talent among the young people of the Cape, and what it might do toward establishing a small gallery for the exhibition of paintings, etchings, sculpture and other work of the artists of the Cape.

If you are interested in becoming a Guarantor of the Cape Playhouse activities, kindly see Mr. Moore.

A SELECTED COLONY OF SUBSTANTIAL AMERICAN HOMES

When you have built at Oyster Harbors—right at your door is a 6539 yard golf course, designed and constructed by Donald Ross and considered by experts to be one of America's finest.

If you are a yachtsman, all Nantucket Sound and beyond, Cotuit Bay, West Bay and North Bay await you. Along eight miles of shore front, nine harbors, some newly dredged, afford shelter places for your craft immediately in front of your residence.

And there is bathing, tennis, riding and fishing, for other leisure hours.

Six miles of private woodland roads are now permanently surfaced.

Your neighbors will be such folks as you would personally select. Their homes, like yours, will be set in large plots among the pine-clad slopes of this 700-acre vacation Colony.

A LETTER OF FRIENDLY FAREWELL

At Sea
June, 1927

Beloved Steinway:

My departure, which had seemed for the last month or so almost beyond human power, is triumphantly achieved—and this not by ignominous flight from any obligation but honestly, with a clear conscience, with no task left undone. Rocking and swaying here on the middle deep in a mood of unbounded leisure, I think back to those final days and nights on land with no little pride, remembering by what austerities and, if I may so put it, by what audacities of labor I earned this interim of calm. And now the time has come for me to mention, and if possible to explain, what may have seemed to you a serious omission of mine during those last few days when I was striving to crowd the work of weeks into an hour. I bade you no farewell.

You will not think, I know, that I omitted this ceremony of friendship because I was hurried and because my duties lay thick upon me, for well do you understand that I have always sought your fellowship most of all when the voices of the outer world have been loudest about me. Our best hours together have been those which, in a worldly sense, I could least afford. When there has been clamor and strain without, you have evermore kept for me, within, a place of serenity and of quiet breathing to which I have flown away a million times as with the wings of a dove and found great peace. Charm of my youth, strong friend of my manhood, it was not likely that I should forget all this in these last days of turmoil. It is not to be supposed that I could forget you while I was bidding farewell to a hundred other friends. How was it, then, that for three days together I did not strike a single chord?

Others, no doubt, in my circumstances, would have played through those rather weakly tearful measures which are known, whether rightly or not, as "Beethoven's Farewell to the Piano"; but our relations have not been of the sentimental sort that would warrant such a procedure. Some would have regaled their sorrow at parting by a selection from the sweeter pages of Chopin in his lachrymose moods; but you and I are no longer younglings, our romantic despairs and exaltations are over, we have glimpsed a nobler beauty in the clear sunlight of music than Chopin and all his crepuscular crew have ever seen in the shadows. Much more to our purpose would have been Beethoven's majestic sonata which the world has called "Absence and Return." Do you remember those syllables of heart-break in the largo introduction, and how the first movement beats with iron fists against the gates of despair, and how finally, after a few measures of scarcely utterable longing, the ecstatic presto begins, terribly difficult for wrist and finger, like a wind from the northwest after a lowering day? Yes, I should have liked to play that one sonata, for although it is packed with sentiment it never declines into sentimentality, but is everywhere held true and taut by the will and mastership of the great man who made it—a supreme musician, but first of all a man. Yet I think that if we had played anything and had followed entirely our inclinations it would have been something written by the King himself. Why, indeed, should we have spent our last moments together upon anything less than consummate, upon any singer less learned and wise and humane than Johann Sebastian Bach? How often we have wondered, while tossing on the shoreless sea of his music, how it is possible for us, for anyone, to find time to play any music other than his! You and I know that he has written the perfect music for every mood, the fullest expression in tone of every thought, that he stretches back to the beginnings and goes on into the future beyond the ken or guess of the most modern experimenters. Certainly, therefore, if we had played anything we should have played him—perhaps that sunny prelude that seems so obvious at the first hearing and so replete with undiscovered depths at the thousandth, perhaps the slow movement of the Italian Concerto, eloquent beyond the power of words, or, more likely, the Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue which ransacks and exhausts the powers of the piano. But whatever we might have chosen from him it would have been thoughtfully glad, profoundly joyous, without a moment of mourning.

For just this, dear friend, is what you and I have discovered about the King of Musicians, that although he knows as well as Chopin himself the materials out of which sadness may be made, yet he never makes it. Rather he catches up into his heaven of sunlight all the lower shadows, striking them through with glory. As far as north is from south removed from the pretty cheerfulness of Mendelssohn—a cheerfulness unearned and therefore shallow, like that of a merry wren—he is always wisely glad, as the wisest men have ever been. In every departure he foresaw return. I think he never said farewell to anything, however deeply beloved, except in terms of rejoicing for what had been and would soon be again. Thinking of all this, I suddenly remember just what we should have played—Bach's "O Come All Ye Faithful." I cannot recall at the moment what particular one of his innumerable works it is drawn from, but you know that it is to be found in that collection of his "Favorite Pieces" which we have played by heart these many years. How my fingers yearn for the keys as that noble melody sings itself in my thought to the slow sway of the ship! That is what we should have played, if anything.

But I think that silence was still better. Even in the volumed harmonies of "O Come All Ye Faithful" I could not have said what it means to me to be leaving for so many months the great room lined with books where you stand—the room in which the moonlight has so often streamed in upon us through the tall windows while we have been thinking and singing together in the night watches. We have had great companions there. We have held mighty converse in that room. We have entertained the sages and the jesters, the scholars and the clowns of tone. Often it has seemed as though the four thousand books ranged along the dusky walls were finding tongue, were crowding down into the pool of light that bather your keys and my hands moving upon them, breaking free from their bondage of silence, bursting into song. Best of all, I think, have been the hours when Beethoven and Mozart, even Bach himself, have been put away and you and I have talked there in the darkness together, speaking such simple and impromptu thoughts as occurred to us at the moment. At such times we have come closest together. You have been my voice, ten voices in one, and we have talked as one being, in a profound soliloquy. We do not bid farewell to friends with whom we have such common memories as this by any worn and conventional ceremony of outward utterance. I am sure that silence was best.

In the months that are before me I shall think many times of the rich and memoried silences of that room. There will be many pianos in the lands to which I am going, and one of these—a tiny creature less than half your size—I look forward to with particular pleasure, but not one of them all knows as you do the ways I love to travel, none of them can guide my steps as you have through the intricate twilight country that lies just beyond the ivory gate. Their voices of wail and high joyance will only recall the familiar voice that now awaits my return. Silence of this kind is a strange thing to you and me, yet it is full of music. Is it not the source from which all tone mysteriously springs, and the reservoir also into which all beautiful voices inevitably return? Hold it sacred, then, in memory of hours we have spent together and in hope of those that we shall spend. For there will come a time, far off as it may now seem to us, some quiet evening in a distant autumn, when the moonlight will be streaming through the high-arched windows as it used, and I, come back at last from wandering, will sing once more with you the majestic cadences of "O Come All Ye Faithful." Having returned from travels over land and sea I shall set forth once more, inward bound, upon new Odysseys of tone, for I, like Ulysses, cannot rest from travel. Until that happy time, silence is best.

Yours forever,

O. S.

THE CAPE PLAYHOUSE PROGRAM

It is not the intention or purpose of The Cape Playhouse, Dennis, Cape Cod, Massachusetts, to make a general canvass for advertising.

The Cape Playhouse program has nothing in common with the ordinary cosmopolitan theatre program. Neither are advertisements displayed on the curtain, by films or in any portion of the house.

The theatre's locale, its atmosphere, the high standing of its casts, devotion to the written drama, and the character of its patrons, will insure the program being retained for perusal and reference. While practicing no discrimination, we have and will have only selected advertisers in keeping with the appreciation and approbation of our patrons. Its composition and circulation will be in keeping with desirable ethics of publicity and free from annoyances from various sources.

A scrutiny of the list of advertisers will show shops, inns, hotels, tea-rooms and other business houses of a high grade who recognize the desirable character of our patrons and subscribers.

They have and are co-operating with our patrons and us in establishing this desirable feature on the Cape.

We earnestly trust that our patrons will favor them with their patronage.

Any information as to advertising should be addressed to
